Flight instruct to build hours

As a CFI you will be responsible for instructing student pilots in flight procedures and techniques, preparing instructional lessons and monitoring student performances. This option is advantageous because you are building your flight time in a structured environment, being compensated for your instruction and impacting the life of another aspiring pilot simultaneously.

Some of the advantages of becoming a CFI include:

- Gaining familiarity with how to appropriately respond to unforeseen weather, aircraft trouble and air traffic
- Networking with individuals who have a like-minded passion for aviation
- Log Pilot-In-Command time while providing flight instruction

Everyone's timeline to 1500 hours is different, depending on the variety of students you are able to teach (the more certificates you hold, the more diverse your students can be), the enrollment size of your flight school, the amount of flight instructors currently working at the school and the size of the fleet available. Most instructors report that it takes about a year and a half to accumulate 1500 hours.

Good luck building your hours!
